

The Crown of the Mushroom King — Full Story Script

Auto-generated from `data/story.json` (story version 7). Do not edit this file by hand — regenerate with `python3 tools/gen-script.py`.

This is the complete text of every waypoint, scene, choice, and ending — all branches shown together (the app shows only one per walk). Conditions in when: lines decide which scene/variant a given walker sees.

Legend — `→` routes to the next post/beat • sets: flags written • gains: collectible • ★/◆ good ending • 🩸 dark ending • ✱ bleak ending • ⚠ stub or unreachable.

Flags

- marked — true iff the honey-cake was KEPT at Post 3 — the first dark mark (fox dead). Does NOT seal Pawn by itself.
- fox_ally — true iff the cake was GIVEN at Post 3 — the fox lives and threads through the rugged arm (alive vs dead scenes).
- road — 'hero' | 'pawn'. Set to hero at the Post 4 fork (both arms). Flipped to pawn ONLY by refusing the cemetery redemption as a marked walker.
- path — 'gentle' | 'rugged' — the Post 4 fork, open to everyone. Rugged = always Hero; gentle is where Pawn can be sealed.
- has_number — true iff the fairy's R3 gift was the number — seeds the faces count (7) at the finale; has_number AND !fumbled -> Crown Reborn.
- route — 'home' | 'raggeth' (Hero) — set at the pond.
- fumbled — set by any wrong/unsure answer in the counting ward — downgrades the ending to Pyrrhic.

All flags: `have_honeycake`, `kind_to_fox`, `fox_ally`, `marked`, `road`, `path`, `fox_scouted`, `steadied`, `has_stick`, `has_water`, `has_number`, `has_strength`, `grove_strength`, `grove_watch`, `brave`, `timid`, `knight_ally`, `redeemed`, `fallen`, `moth_spent`, `route`, `wise`, `hardened`, `fumbled`

Post 1 — The Entrance `#crown/wp1`

img: `crown/wp1.jpg`

On arrival sets: `have_honeycake=true`

Voice: The Lantern-Moth (faint, guttering, sacrificial)

A moth settles on the post beside you, its light guttering like a candle in a draft. “Traveler. Come close — closer, while my light still holds.” With every word the glow fades a little more. “I am the last of King Bolete’s messengers. The others, Lord Raggeth caught and snuffed out, one by one. I have flown a long way to find you, and I have not much left to burn.”

Behind it, the wood is wrong — grey, too silent, the smell of rot on the cold air.

“The king is dying. His crown is a ring of golden mushroom-caps — for what else would a mushroom-king wear? — and Lord Raggeth crept into the castle and tore three of those caps away. Where the crown goes dark, the forest follows. You can feel it already — the cold, the silence, the rot creeping root to root. By the last bell of nightfall the king’s heart will stop, and this wood will be Raggeth’s to rule: a kingdom of ash and bone. Three caps, scattered through the dark. Find them. Mend the crown. It is the only way left.”

It presses something small into your hand. “A honey-cake. There is little kindness left in this wood, traveler — spend yours well. It may cost more than you think. Go now. And trust no light but mine.”

→ continues to `wp2`

Post 2 — Into the Forest `#crown/wp2`

img: `crown/wp2.jpg`

Voice: The Lantern-Moth (faint, guttering, sacrificial)

You step off the road and the wood closes behind you like a held breath. The trees here are sick — bark gone black and weeping, leaves curled to ash. A small bird lies still in the path; the moth’s light passes over it and moves on, and does not look.

And the trees have faces — had you not noticed? Look again, as you walk. In the bark of the old ones: faces. Eyes and mouths and furrowed brows, watching you pass. “The forest’s old sentinels,” the moth says softly. “Awake since the first acorn fell. Once they sang to every traveler who came this way. But the king is dying, and one by one they have gone silent and still, their eyes drifting shut. They watch you now without a sound.”

The moth gathers what light it has, and tells you plainly what waits ahead, so you cannot say you were not warned:

“There are lights in this wood that wear a kind voice and a kind face, and they lead only to the bone-fields. There is a rot that spreads by touch and never, ever stops — it is the king’s dying, made into a thing that crawls. There are dead who do not rest, who guard to the grave what they died for. And there is Raggeth himself — who does not always kill what he catches. Sometimes he keeps it. Sometimes he turns it, and sends it back wearing your own face.”

Far off, a bell tolls — slow, and then slower. “The king’s heart,” the moth murmurs. “Hear how it fails. Three caps: one lies where a dying friend keeps watch, one where a false light feeds, one among the dead who were never avenged. This is the road ahead, traveler. It does not get kinder than here.”

Choice — “Commit to the road ahead, or turn back?”

1. “Go on into the dark” • → wp3

You set your jaw and follow the leaning, half-rotted signpost deeper in. The moth’s light steadies, just a little, as if glad of company.

2. “Turn back — this is not my fight” • → ending

You turn for the road, and the daylight, and home. The moth does not plead. It only dims. Behind you, as you go, the last of its light gutters out, and the wood draws its silence closed over the king, and over the fox who waited, and over the dead who were never avenged. By morning there is no forest here at all — only ash, and bone, and a cold that came to stay. You were the last one it sent for.

ENDING: THE END • soft-bad

- exit: “Wait. Turn back. You’ll go.” → commit/continue

Post 3 — The Great Old Tree #crown/wp3

img: crown/wp3.jpg

Voice: The Fox (a thread of a voice, then warm)

Beneath the oldest tree, in the last patch the rot has not yet reached, a fox with one silver eye lies in the leaves. He is little more than bone and grey fur, and his breath comes shallow. He has guarded this place since before the tree stood tall — and now he is starving, for the blight has killed everything he might have hunted.

“I cannot move,” he says, and his voice is a thread. “I have not eaten in a week. I will not last the night.” Your hand finds the honey-cake. It is the only food you carry, and the night is long. This is the choice that sets your road.

Choice — “Give him the honey-cake, or keep it?”

1. “Give the honey-cake” • sets: kind_to_fox=true, fox_ally=true • gains: Cap of Kindness • → wp4

He eats slowly, gratefully, and when he is done his silver eye kindles like a struck coin. Strength returns to him by degrees. “Kindness,” he says softly, “is the first gold — rarer in this wood than any crown. You spent it on a dying old fox when you might have kept it for yourself.” From the moss he lifts a small golden cap and lays it in your palm. “I will not forget. When the dark is deepest, look for my eye.” He rises, unsteady but alive, and slips into the shadows ahead, going before you. You will not walk this wood alone.

2. “Keep it for yourself” • sets: kind_to_fox=false, marked=true • gains: Cap of Kindness • → wp4

You close your hand around the honey-cake and step around him. The fox says nothing — only watches you pass with his one silver eye, and you feel that eye on your back long after the trees have hidden him.

There, in the leaves where he lies, the first golden cap gleams; it was the king's, and the fox had no strength left to guard it. You lift it. Behind you, the old fox lowers his head to the cold ground; he will not see the morning.

And something in the wood feels the cruelty of it — a small coldness, given freely, in a place starved of warmth. It marks you. Not as his, not yet — the road ahead is still yours to choose — but the wood will remember the cold you carried in, and so, you suspect, will whatever stirred just now in the deep of the trees.

Post 4 — The Fork #crown/wp4

awards Cap of Cleverness · img: crown/wp4.jpg

Voice: The Lantern-Moth (faint, guttering, sacrificial)

The path forks at a leaning, half-rotted post. To your right, the trail bends away gentle and even, winding off through the trees on level ground. Straight ahead, it pitches down into a dark hollow — stony, steep, and far longer, the harder of the two roads by a long mile. Both, the moth says, come at last to the same pond, and the sleeping king beyond it.

“Two roads, and both of them true,” the moth says, hovering close. “The right-hand way is kinder to your legs, and quicker to the king. The straight way drops into the low ground — steeper, longer, thick with his biting flies. But the king's oldest friends keep to that road, and there are gifts on it found nowhere else. Few choose it now.” It steadies before your face. “The crown wants gold of three kinds, and one of them is cleverness — which is not cunning, child, but clear sight: knowing a true thing when you meet it, and choosing it with open eyes. So choose. Not the easy road, nor the hard one — your road. Only know which you take, and why.”

Choice — “Which way do you take — the gentle right, or the rugged straight?”

1. “Take the gentle path (right)” · sets: path="gentle", road="hero" · gains: Cap of Cleverness · → wp5

You choose the right-hand way, level and kind, and you choose it knowing — quicker to the king, with strength saved for whatever waits at the water. “Clear-eyed,” the moth says. “That is the second gold.” The Cap of Cleverness settles warm in your pocket — earned not by a clever tongue but by seeing plainly and choosing well. The gentle trail bends away to the right, and you follow it.

2. “Take the rugged path (straight ahead)” · sets: path="rugged", road="hero" · gains: Cap of Cleverness · → r1

You choose the hard road — straight on, down into the stony hollow, the longer and steeper way — and you choose it knowing exactly what it costs, for the gifts the king's old friends keep there. “Clear-eyed, and bold with it,” the moth says, half a laugh and half a worry. “That is the second gold — and you'll have need of the rest before this road is done.” The Cap of Cleverness settles warm in your pocket. The trail pitches down before you into the dark.

Post 5 — The Cemetery #crown/wp5

awards Cap of Courage · img: crown/wp5.jpg

Scene 1 — when: NOT marked

Voice: The Stone Knight / dead captain (vast, grief-worn)

The trees give way to a small graveyard — a dozen old stones, leaning every which way in the grey light. These are the king's knights, the last of the old mushroom-guard, who stood against Raggeth an age ago and fell to the last, and were never avenged. The wood forgot them. The rot has not — it creeps among the stones like spilled ink.

At the center stands one great cracked stone, and at its foot a candle, long gone cold. “The last cap is here,” the moth breathes, “in the keeping of the dead. They will not give it to the timid. You must wake their captain — and you must not look away when he wakes.”

Choice — “Light the candle and wake the guardian, or tiptoe past?”

1. “Light the candle” · sets: brave=true, knight_ally=true · gains: Cap of Courage · → wp6

Your hands shake so badly you can barely breathe on the wick — but it catches, one small gold flame in a sea of grey. The great stone splits. Something rises from it: a knight of blackened oak and toadstool, vast, its eyes two coals, an age of grief in its ruined face. It would be so easy to run. You do not run. For a long, cold moment the dead captain weighs you — then slowly bows. “Courage,” it says, in a voice like a closing tomb, “is the last gold, and it is bought with fear, not the lack of it.” It lays the third cap in your hand, and then it does not sink back. It takes up its broken sword and falls in at your shoulder. “We could not save the king. We will see you to him. And when you face Raggeth — for you will — we will not look away, and neither will you.” You walk on with a dead knight at your side.

2. “Tiptoe quietly past” · sets: timid=true · gains: Cap of Courage · → wp6

You cannot do it. You hold your breath and slip between the graves, quiet as the dead themselves, and you do not light the candle, and you do not wake the captain. The last cap you find at the graveyard's edge, set upon a small stone — a young knight's grave, one who fell too soon. You lift it with hands that will not stop shaking, and all across that little ground you feel the weight of eyes that hoped for more from you, and let you pass anyway. No knight rises to walk with you. But the fox is still ahead, and the moth is still at your shoulder, and that will have to be enough.

Scene 2 — when: marked

Voice: The Stone Knight / dead captain (vast, grief-worn)

The trees give way to the small graveyard, a dozen leaning stones in the grey light — the king's old knights, who died resisting Raggeth an age ago, and were never avenged. But they do not stir for you the way they stir for other travelers. They are looking at you. They see something on you: the cold thing you did beneath the old tree, when a starving friend asked for bread and you closed your hand. The fox's death clings to you like a smell, and the dead can smell it.

The great stone splits, and the captain rises — vast, oak and toadstool, an age of grief in his ruined face — and he weighs you a long, cold moment. “Raggeth's rot does not always come from outside, child,” he says, in a voice like a closing tomb. “Sometimes it begins as one small cold thing a heart does, and lets grow. You carry such a thing now. I can see it on you.” He turns to the cold candle at his feet. “Light it — face what you did, and choose to be better — and it will burn away. It will hurt; there is nothing harder than looking straight at the worst of yourself. But you will walk on clean. Or leave it dark, and keep your small cold thing, and we will both know what you are becoming.”

Choice — “Light the candle, or leave it dark?”

1. “Light the candle — face what you did” • sets: redeemed=true, brave=true • gains: Cap of Courage
• → wp6

Your hands shake — not at the dead now, but at the harder thing: looking straight at the fox you left to die, and not turning away. You breathe on the wick. It catches. And it does hurt — a small, clean burning, the cold thing in you guttering out — and when it's done you are lighter, and emptied, and yourself again. The captain bows. “Courage is not only facing the dark out there,” he says. “It is facing the dark in here. That is the last gold, and the hardest won. Go on — mend his crown. And carry the fox with you now: not as a weight, but as a promise.” The Cap of Courage is warm in your hand. You walk on a Hero — scarred, and clean.

2. “Leave it dark — keep the cold” • sets: fallen=true, road="pawn" • → wp6

You look at the cold candle, and the dead, and the long hard road of being good — and you do not light it. Why freeze and starve for a dying king and a dead fox? Let the wood rot. You'll see to yourself. You turn from the candle and the dead — and a small voice you have not heard before, dry as old leaves and warm as a friend, speaks for the first time, pleased. “There now,” says Raggeth. “Don't waste your light on the dead — they wasted theirs. Come to me, clever one, and you'll never starve, never freeze, never lose again.” The dead sink back into their stones and do not try to stop you. Somehow that is the worst of it. You walk on — his, now, though you tell yourself you are only your own.

Post 6 — The Way to the Pond #crown/wp6

img: crown/wp6.jpg

Scene 1 — when: road = hero

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

Three caps, cold in your hand, and the wood gone nearly black around you. The moth's light is a dying ember now; it can barely lift from your shoulder. The bell — the king's heart — tolls once more, so faint you feel it more than hear it, and the silence that follows runs on too long before the next.

“Hurry,” the moth breathes. “He is almost gone. The path climbs from here — the pond lies above us, at the top of the wood, where the forest was born, and where, tonight, it may die.” The signpost points the way up into the dark. You climb.

→ continues to `wp7`

Scene 2 — when: road = pawn

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

The way to the pond is easy now, and that’s the horror of it. The rot doesn’t touch you; the cold lets you pass; Raggeth’s voice keeps you warm company, naming all the ways the king failed you and all the ways he’ll reward you. You walk untroubled through a dying wood while it dies around you, and you tell yourself that’s wisdom, and not the first lie you’ve told yourself tonight.

→ continues to `wp7`

The Marker Tree `#crown/r1`

The Rugged Road · R1 · `img: crown/r1.jpg`

Scene 1 — when: fox_ally AND road = hero

Voice: The Fox (a thread of a voice, then warm)

The rugged way tips downward past a leaning marker, into a hollow of black trees you cannot see the bottom of. The fox pads up beside you, ears pricked, glad of the hard road. “The old way,” he says, dry and warm. “The way of the king’s friends. Few take it now.” Below, the trail drops away into shadow.

Choice — “Send the fox ahead to scout, or keep him close?”

1. “Send him ahead to scout” · `sets: fox_scouted=true` · → `r2`

He slips into the dark to read the way for you. You walk the drop alone a while — but you will know what is coming.

2. “Keep him close” · `sets: fox_scouted=false` · → `r2`

You would rather face it together than know it early. He stays at your heel, and you go down into the hollow side by side.

Scene 2 — when: road = hero

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

The rugged way tips downward past a leaning marker, into a hollow of black trees you cannot see the bottom of. You reach the marker alone — no one to send ahead, no one to walk beside. The hollow waits below, and the cold comes up out of it to meet you.

Choice — “Press on now, or steady yourself first?”

1. “Press on while you’ve nerve” · sets: steadied=false · → r2

You don’t give the dark time to grow in your mind. Down you go.

2. “Take a breath at the marker” · sets: steadied=true · → r2

You gather yourself a moment before the drop. Slower — but your heart is your own.

Scene 3 — when: road = pawn — ⚠️ STUB & currently unreachable (the rugged arm is always Hero)

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

[PAWN — not yet written. Rugged arm, the Marker Tree. Placeholder so the trail does not dead-end.]

→ continues to r2

The Bottom of the Hill #crown/r2

The Rugged Road · R2 · img: crown/r2.jpg

Scene 1 — when: fox_ally AND road = hero

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

The descent ends, and the trail bends away to your right, leveling out toward a stand of distant pines — the long flat to the spring begins here, and the climb to the king is somewhere far ahead. The fox trots the bend with you, ranging ahead and circling back, glad of the easy ground. At your feet, among the leaf-litter, lie fallen branches — stout, straight, stick-high.

Choice — “Take up a walking stick for the road, or travel light?”

1. “Take a stick” · sets: has_stick=true · → r3

You choose a good straight one, test your weight on it, tuck it under your arm. It’s nothing now, here on the flat — but there’s a hill between you and the king.

2. “Travel light” · sets: has_stick=false · → r3

Your hands are free and your step is quick, and the flat is easy going. You don’t think about the climb yet.

Scene 2 — when: road = hero

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

The descent ends, and the trail bends away to your right, leveling out toward a stand of distant pines — the long flat to the spring begins here, and the climb to the king is somewhere far ahead. You walk the bend alone, your own footsteps the only sound on the flat. At your feet, among the leaf-litter, lie fallen branches — stout, straight, stick-high.

Choice — “Take up a walking stick for the road, or travel light?”

1. “Take a stick” • sets: has_stick=true • → r3

You choose a good straight one, test your weight on it, tuck it under your arm. It’s nothing now, here on the flat — but there’s a hill between you and the king.

2. “Travel light” • sets: has_stick=false • → r3

Your hands are free and your step is quick, and the flat is easy going. You don’t think about the climb yet.

Scene 3 — when: road = pawn — ⚠ STUB & currently unreachable (the rugged arm is always Hero)

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

[PAWN — not yet written. Rugged arm, the Bottom of the Hill. Placeholder so the trail does not dead-end.]

→ continues to r3

The Fairy Spring #crown/r3

The Rugged Road • R3 • img: crown/r3.jpg

Scene 1 — when: fox_ally AND road = hero

On entry sets: has_water=true

The flat brings you in among the only pines on the walk — green, unrotted, resinous — where a spring bubbles up clear among the roots and one old pine creaks like a slow voice. The fox laps once at the pool and settles at its edge, ears soft, as if he knows this place. Kneel at the pool and the creaking pine bends low, and the fairy speaks — tiny, ancient, kind. “A traveler, on the king’s road, and brave for the stony way. Drink. Fill your flask. The spring feeds the king’s own heart-well, and it is the last clean water in the wood.”

You drink — so cold it aches, so clean it steadies you — and fill the fairy’s flask. Then she says: “I’ll give you one thing more to carry. Choose.”

Choice — “The fairy’s parting gift — which do you ask for?”

1. “Ask for a number to remember” • sets: has_number=true • → r4

“Then hold this,” she whispers. “Seven. When you stand before the dark one and must name the watching faces of the wood, you will be glad you carried it. Seven. Don’t let the fear knock it loose.” You don’t know yet what it means — but you will hold it.

2. “Ask for a blessing of strength” · sets: has_strength=true · → r4

“Then take strength instead,” she says, and the cold water warms in you, steadying your legs for the long climb and the longer dark. You’ll feel it carrying you up the hill — but you’ll have to count the faces yourself, and trust your own tally.

Scene 2 — when: road = hero

On entry sets: has_water=true

The flat brings you in among the only pines on the walk — green, unrotted, resinous — where a spring bubbles up clear among the roots and one old pine creaks like a slow voice. Kneel at the pool and the creaking pine bends low, and the fairy speaks — tiny, ancient, kind. “A traveler, on the king’s road, and brave for the stony way. Drink. Fill your flask. The spring feeds the king’s own heart-well, and it is the last clean water in the wood.”

You drink — so cold it aches, so clean it steadies you — and fill the fairy’s flask. Then she says: “I’ll give you one thing more to carry. Choose.”

Choice — “The fairy’s parting gift — which do you ask for?”

1. “Ask for a number to remember” · sets: has_number=true · → r4

“Then hold this,” she whispers. “Seven. When you stand before the dark one and must name the watching faces of the wood, you will be glad you carried it. Seven. Don’t let the fear knock it loose.” You don’t know yet what it means — but you will hold it.

2. “Ask for a blessing of strength” · sets: has_strength=true · → r4

“Then take strength instead,” she says, and the cold water warms in you, steadying your legs for the long climb and the longer dark. You’ll feel it carrying you up the hill — but you’ll have to count the faces yourself, and trust your own tally.

Scene 3 — when: road = pawn — ⚠️ STUB & currently unreachable (the rugged arm is always Hero)

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

[PAWN — not yet written. Rugged arm, the Fairy Spring. Placeholder so the trail does not dead-end.]

→ continues to r4

The Tree-Face Grove #crown/r4

The Rugged Road · R4 · img: crown/r4.jpg

Scene 1 — when: fox_ally AND road = hero

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

The path runs into a grove thick with carved faces — the watching wood, more awake here near the spring's clean magic, eyes opening as you pass. The fox pads close to your leg, unbothered; they know him too. "A friend of the king," they murmur, trunk to trunk. "The fairy spoke of you. We have two gifts, and you may take one."

Choice — "What do you ask of the grove?"

1. "Ask the grove for strength on the road" · sets: grove_strength=true · → r5

Their warmth pours into you for what's to come — the climb, and the dark beyond it. You'll feel it carrying you up the hill.

2. "Ask the grove to keep watch at your back" · sets: grove_watch=true · → r5

"Then we will hold the dark behind you, as far as we can reach." Their watching cousins line the road ahead; on the long walk to Raggeth, the dark will press less close at your heels.

Scene 2 — when: road = hero

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

The path runs into a grove thick with carved faces — the watching wood, more awake here near the spring's clean magic, eyes opening as you pass. They take you in, the lone walker on the hard road, and weigh you. "A friend of the king," they murmur at last, trunk to trunk. "The fairy spoke of you. We have two gifts, and you may take one."

Choice — "What do you ask of the grove?"

1. "Ask the grove for strength on the road" · sets: grove_strength=true · → r5

Their warmth pours into you for what's to come — the climb, and the dark beyond it. You'll feel it carrying you up the hill.

2. "Ask the grove to keep watch at your back" · sets: grove_watch=true · → r5

"Then we will hold the dark behind you, as far as we can reach." Their watching cousins line the road ahead; on the long walk to Raggeth, the dark will press less close at your heels.

Scene 3 — when: road = pawn — ⚠ STUB & currently unreachable (the rugged arm is always Hero)

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

[PAWN — not yet written. Rugged arm, the Tree-Face Grove. Placeholder so the trail does not dead-end.]

→ continues to r5

The Steep Incline #crown/r5

The Rugged Road · R5 · awards Cap of Courage · img: crown/r5.jpg

Scene 1 — when: fox_ally AND road = hero

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

The flat ends and the trail rears up — steep, stony, dark — the last hard stretch to the king. The fox goes up ahead of you, light on the stones, and looks back to see you follow.

_Variant (has_stick AND grove_strength):_ You set your stick to the cold rock and the grove's warmth at your back, and the cruel hill, though it burns, is not unwinnable.

_Variant (has_stick):_ You set your stick to the cold rock and haul up on it — glad past words you stooped for it at the bottom of the hill.

_Variant (grove_strength):_ The grove's warmth carries you up lighter than your own legs could manage.

Variant (default): You climb on raw hands, and the hill takes all you have and asks for more.

Choice — “How do you take the hill?”

1. “Dig in and climb hard” · sets: brave=true · gains: Cap of Courage · → wp7

You haul up without stopping and crest the top, breath ragged, legs aflame. “The last gold,” says the fox, or the wind. “You climbed.”

2. “Rest, then climb” · sets: brave=true · gains: Cap of Courage · → wp7

You catch your breath, steady your heart, and then go slow and stubborn to the top without quitting. Not the fastest — but you did not stop.

3. “Nearly turn back, then climb anyway” · sets: brave=true, faltered=true · gains: Cap of Courage · → wp7

The night nearly beats you halfway up — but you crawl the last of it on will alone, and stand, shaking, at the top. You know exactly what this gold cost.

Scene 2 — when: road = hero

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

The flat ends and the trail rears up — steep, stony, dark — the last hard stretch to the king. There is no one ahead of you and no one behind; the climb is yours alone.

_Variant (has_stick AND grove_strength):_ You set your stick to the cold rock and the grove's warmth at your back, and the cruel hill, though it burns, is not unwinnable.

_Variant (has_stick):_ You set your stick to the cold rock and haul up on it — glad past words you stooped for it at the bottom of the hill.

_Variant (grove_strength):_ The grove's warmth carries you up lighter than your own legs could manage.

Variant (default): You climb on raw hands, and the hill takes all you have and asks for more.

Choice — “How do you take the hill?”

1. “Dig in and climb hard” · sets: brave=true · gains: Cap of Courage · → wp7

You haul up without stopping and crest the top, breath ragged, legs aflame. “The last gold,” says the fox, or the wind. “You climbed.”

2. “Rest, then climb” · sets: brave=true · gains: Cap of Courage · → wp7

You catch your breath, steady your heart, and then go slow and stubborn to the top without quitting. Not the fastest — but you did not stop.

3. “Nearly turn back, then climb anyway” · sets: brave=true, faltered=true · gains: Cap of Courage · → wp7

The night nearly beats you halfway up — but you crawl the last of it on will alone, and stand, shaking, at the top. You know exactly what this gold cost.

Scene 3 — when: road = pawn — ⚠ STUB & currently unreachable (the rugged arm is always Hero)

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

[PAWN — not yet written. Rugged arm, the Steep Incline (Cap of Courage). Placeholder so the trail does not dead-end.]

→ continues to wp7

Post 7 — The Pond #crown/wp7

img: crown/wp7.jpg

Scene 1 — when: road = hero

You kneel at the king’s toadstool throne and show him the three golden caps — kindness, cleverness, courage, gathered the length of the wood. The dim old eyes find them, and something like dawn moves across his ruined face. “All three. Then you have already done a brave and a great thing — and what comes next is yours to choose.” His cracked hand lifts. “Set these in my crown now, and I am saved: the rot will heal, and you may go home in honor, your task done. No one could ask more of you.” His voice drops. “But know this before you choose. Raggeth still lives, deep in the wood, and he holds the heart of my crown — the last and truest gold. Save me now, and you save me for your lifetime. End him, and you save this wood forever. There is no shame in either road.”

Endings (one is chosen by state):

when: timid AND NOT fox_ally — ⚠ currently UNREACHABLE — `timid` is only set on the unmarked cemetery path, so the fox is always alive there

One by one you press the golden caps home, and light runs through the crown and steadies the king — and you saved him, though you flinched when it counted, and you walk the long way home by yourself through a wood slowly coming back to life. No companion at your side — only the memory of one, and the vow you made at the graves to be better than the worst night of your life. It is a lonely walk. It is also, you understand, the beginning of a better road. Your story is complete.

ENDING: ♦ The Long Watch • good

- (terminal — “Walk it again”)

when: timid

One by one you press the golden caps home into the bare ring of the crown, and light runs through it and steadies the king — but you flinched, once, on the way here, when it counted, and the ending is a quieter one. The king lives; the wood will live. No retinue of friends comes to walk you out; the moth lights you to the road, faithful to the last, and that is enough, and it is a little lonely. “You saved my forest,” the king says, gentler than a bell. “Go home in honor — and be a little braver next time. There is always a next time, in a wood.” The face-trees open their eyes as you pass, and watch you go, and do not quite smile. Your story is complete.

ENDING: ♦ The Long Watch • good

- (terminal — “Walk it again”)

when: redeemed AND NOT fox_ally

One by one you press the golden caps home into the bare ring of the king’s crown, and light runs through it like dawn through water, and does not stop; the rot draws back, and all around the pond the dying simply stops, and King Bolete stands tall and shining and saved. “Go home in honor,” he says, his voice a bell. And you walk home alone — no fox at your heel; you saw to that, under the old tree, and you have made your peace with it the hard way. But the king is saved, the crown is mended, and the wood is greening behind you. You carry the fox with you now, not as a weight but as a promise kept late. The dawn is yours, and quieter than it might have been — and you have earned the quiet. Your story is complete.

ENDING: ♦ The Gentle Dawn • good

- (terminal — “Walk it again”)

when: NOT fox_ally

One by one you press the golden caps home into the bare ring of the king’s crown — and the moment the third is set, light runs through it like dawn through water, and does not stop. It pours from the crown into the king, into the roots, out through the whole black wood; the rot draws back into the earth, and all around the pond the dying simply stops. The heart-well clears and rises, and King Bolete stands — tall, and shining, and saved. “You carried my crown out of the dark and made me whole,” he says, his voice a bell now. “Go home in honor.” And you walk home — but you walk it alone. No fox runs at your heel: you left him cold in the leaves at the start of the road, and a saved and singing forest does not give the dead back. The face-trees open their eyes to watch you pass, and some of them soften toward you, slowly — you did save them — though you carry the one small cruelty you let into the wood like a stone you cannot set down. You saved the king. You saved the forest. You did it with a cold place in you that the long night never quite warmed. Your story is complete.

Far off in the deep wood a thin green smoke still rises — Raggeth, unbeaten, biding. But that is a tale for another day. Tonight, you have won.

ENDING: ♦ The Gentle Dawn · good

- (terminal — “Walk it again”)

when: default

One by one you press the golden caps home into the bare ring of the king’s crown — and the moment the third is set, light runs through it like dawn through water, and does not stop. It pours from the crown into the king, into the throne, into the roots, out through the whole black wood. King Bolete straightens, grey going green, his crown blazing gold; the rot draws back into the earth; and all around the pond, the dying simply stops. The heart-well answers him, its waters clearing and rising. The king stands — tall, and shining, and saved — and his voice is no longer a whisper but a bell: “You carried my crown out of the dark and made me whole. Go home in honor, brave one. The wood will sing your name.” As you walk back down through the trees, the forest is already waking around you — green returning, birdsong, the face-trees opening their eyes to watch you pass and, one by one, beginning to smile. You saved the king. You saved the forest. Your story is complete.

Far off in the deep wood a thin green smoke still rises — Raggeth, unbeaten, biding. But that is a tale for another brave soul, another day. Tonight, you have won.

ENDING: ♦ The Gentle Dawn · good

- (terminal — “Walk it again”)

Choice — “Rest your quest here with honor, or go on to end Raggeth forever?”

1. “Set the caps in the crown — your task is done” · sets: route="home"
2. “Keep the caps, and go end Raggeth forever” · sets: route="raggeth" · → rg_road

“Then keep the gold,” the king says. “You’ll need it for what waits.” The moth flutters down before your face, its small light trembling. “This is where I must leave you. I cannot go where he is — his dark would snuff me out in a breath. You go alone from here.”

“But listen first, for this is how he is beaten. Raggeth’s rot is bound to this wood by the wood’s own count — and the wood will tell you the numbers, if you walk its whole length and pay attention. As you go, count three things. The resting-benches along the road — not these here by the pond, mind, but the ones from here onward to his hut. The feast-tables in the bright meadow. And the watching faces where the trail cuts through the fallen tree. Three true numbers. Carry them to him, name them aloud, and his binding breaks. You cannot learn them by cutting across — only by walking the road. So walk it.”

It rests a moment against your cheek, light as ash. “Follow the red tree-arrows, and only them. You’ll see his hut across the hollow before the path reaches it; never leave the markers — the wood between is where the bones are. Go bravely. And come back.” The light lifts away, and then the moth is gone, and for the first time all night, you are alone.

Scene 2 — when: default

Voice: King Bolete (ancient, failing, near a whisper)

The pond, and the king on his throne, grey and cracked and nearly gone. He opens one dim eye, and looks at you — and at the gold in your hands — and he sees exactly what you are. He does not plead. “So. The dark has you.” His voice is no louder than a breath. “I’ll not beg; a king does not, and begging never turned a heart already turned. But someone should tell you true, at the end: the gold you carry could still mend my crown and save this wood. It is not too late for the wood.” A pause. “It is only, perhaps, too late for you. Do as you will. You always meant to.”

Choice — “What do you do?”

1. “Carry the gold to Raggeth — strike your bargain” · → rg_road

You close your hand around the caps. Let the king die; Raggeth holds the power in this wood, and you mean to stand on the winning side of it. The king says nothing as you turn toward the deep wood. Raggeth’s voice is warm as a hearth. “Good. Oh, good. Come — bring your gift. You’ll be rewarded as he never rewarded you.”

2. “Take what you have and go home — leave them all to it” · → ending

You’ll serve no one, dark or light. You’ll just go. You pocket the gold, turn your back on the dying king and the waiting dark both, and walk out the way you came.

Behind you the forest goes quiet, and quieter, and the last of the king’s light winks out somewhere in the trees. You reach the trailhead as the rot reaches the wood’s edge. You’re fine. You’re exactly as fine as you were, and not one bit more. And in the years after, when you think of the wood at all, you’ll remember a dying king who would not beg, and a fox you let go cold under an old tree — and you’ll wonder, only sometimes, only late, what the other road might have made of you.

ENDING: ✱ The Cold Walk Home · bad

- (terminal — “Walk it again”)

Into the Deep Wood #crown/rg_road

The Road to Raggeth · (no QR — in-app “Walk on” beat)

Scene 1 — when: road = hero

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

You cross from the pond and the red markers take you down into the deep wood — darker here than anywhere, no moth, no king, no fox, only you and the red arrows nailed to the black trees, one and then the next. The dark does not last. The trees thin, the ground rises in a long gentle climb, and the path carries you up, out of the gloom, toward a growing light ahead.

_Variant (grove_watch):_ And the dark keeps its distance as you go — the grove’s watching cousins lining the way, holding it back from your heels.

→ continues to `rg_meadow`

Scene 2 — when: road = pawn

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

The same red markers take you down into the deep wood — but it means something else for you now. You’re not solving anything; you’re going home, as Raggeth has taught you to think of it. His voice keeps you warm company in the dark, naming all the ways the king failed you, and all the ways he will not.

→ continues to `rg_meadow`

The Wildflower Meadow `#crown/rg_meadow`

The Road to Raggeth • (no QR — in-app “Walk on” beat)

Scene 1 — when: road = hero

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

You come out into sudden light: a wide wildflower meadow, warm and gold and humming with bees, lovely past belief so near the dark one’s house. And Raggeth’s voice drifts sweet across it: “There now. Rest. You’ve come so far. The king has waited this long; he can wait a while more.” Benches sit among the flowers, set just so, inviting.

[Count the resting-benches as you go — and remember, only those from the pond onward, never the pond’s own.]

→ continues to `rg_picnic`

Scene 2 — when: road = pawn

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

The trees thin and you come out into the wide wildflower meadow, warm and gold — and its warmth wraps you like approval now, not a trap; laid on, you tell yourself, for you. “There now,” Raggeth murmurs, fond. “You’ve chosen well. Rest, if you like. You’ve earned it.”

→ continues to `rg_picnic`

The Picnic Place #crown/rg_picnic

The Road to Raggeth • (no QR — in-app “Walk on” beat)

Scene 1 — when: road = hero

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

The path leads on to a quiet picnic place, tables in the warm gold light, and the pull to stop is strong — the wood’s craftiest trick, not to scare you back but to keep you.

[Count the feast-tables here in the meadow.]

Choice — “Rest a moment, then rise — or march straight through?”

1. “Rest a moment, then walk on” • sets: wise=true • → rg_faces

You sit, you breathe, you let your legs recover — and then you stand and go, because no meadow will make you forget the grey king and the dying wood. Resting was wise; rising was braver.

2. “March straight through” • sets: hardened=true • → rg_faces

You don’t trust the warmth for a heartbeat; you keep your eyes on the red arrows and go — counting the tables as you pass, careful not to lose the number in your hurry.

Scene 2 — when: road = pawn

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

The path leads on to the quiet picnic place, tables in the gold light. You sit if you please and rise when you please; nothing here is testing you, you tell yourself. Why would it? You’re going home.

→ continues to rg_faces

The Fallen-Tree Faces #crown/rg_faces

The Road to Raggeth • (no QR — in-app “Walk on” beat)

Scene 1 — when: road = hero

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

The light dies behind you, the trees close in, and the trail comes to a great fallen tree it cuts straight through — and here the carved faces crowd thickest, watching from every trunk around the gap.

[Count the watching faces here at the fallen tree.]

_Variant (has_number):_ And you understand, now, what the fairy meant — count them, and you will find she gave you the truth.

→ continues to rg_lair

Scene 2 — when: road = pawn

Voice: Narrator (low, warm)

The light dies and the trail cuts through the great fallen tree — and here the carved faces crowd thick, and as you pass, every one of them turns away from you, every carved eye closing as you come. You tell yourself you don't care. Mostly you believe it.

→ continues to rg_lair

The Lair in Sight #crown/rg_lair

The Road to Raggeth • (no QR — in-app “Walk on” beat)

Scene 1 — when: road = hero

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

Through a gap you see it across the hollow — the black hut, the smoking cauldron. Close. The path bends the long way round, and the cold voice wheedles: “Why walk so far? The hut is just there. Cut across; save your legs. Come straight to me.” But you remember the bones — and you remember you cannot know the wood's numbers without walking its whole road.

Choice — “Stay on the markers, or cut across?”

1. “Stay on the red markers” • → rg_hut

You keep the path, down and around, and Raggeth's voice sours from coaxing to a hiss as he sees you won't be tricked.

2. “Cut across toward the hut” • → rg_hut

You step off the markers toward the close, easy hut — and the ground is not ground. The dark between the trees is the bone-field; it drags at your feet, and the corpse-light kindles ahead, smiling. This is how he takes travelers. The wood has you — but not yet. And you'd have reached him without the numbers, and lost anyway.

Scene 2 — when: road = pawn

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

Through a gap you see it across the hollow — the black hut, the smoking cauldron. Close. Raggeth wheedles you to cut across and save your legs. You have no count to lose now — but the bone-field is still the bone-field.

Choice — “Stay on the markers, or cut across?”

1. “Stay on the red markers” • → rg_hut

You keep the path, and his voice warms further, pleased you came so biddably.

2. “Cut across toward the hut” • → rg_hut

You step off the markers — and the ground is the bone-field; it drags at your feet, and the corpse-light kindles ahead, smiling. Even his own creature, the wood will swallow off the path. The wood has you — but not yet.

The Hut and the Hatch #crown/rg_hut

The Road to Raggeth • (no QR — in-app “Walk on” beat)

BUILD NOTE: REAL-WORLD: put a physical 'KEEP CLOSED' sign on the actual hut hatch — there may be real wasps in there.

Scene 1 — when: road = hero

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

The long way round brings you to the hut at last — small and mean and very old, its boards weeping rot, the cauldron seething before it. Raggeth is a cold thinness in the air. On the hut’s face is a small black hatch, and the voice turns silky: “There’s a treasure behind that hatch — the king’s last gold, perhaps. Open it. Go on — open it, and see.”

Choice — “Open the hatch, or leave it?”

1. “Leave the hatch shut” • → rg_confront

You don’t touch it. The answer was never behind a door he wants you to open. Raggeth’s voice curdles with annoyance.

2. “Open the hatch” • → rg_confront

Your hand goes to the latch — and a night’s worth of warnings catch you a beat too late: the hatch is not where the treasure is. It’s where his swarm is. Get back!

Scene 2 — when: road = pawn

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

The long way round brings you to the hut — small and mean, the cauldron seething. Raggeth is a cold gathered nothing in the air. He points you to the black hatch: “Your reward’s within, little one. Take it.”

Choice — “Open the hatch, or leave it?”

1. “Leave the hatch shut” • → rg_enslave

You don't touch it. Even now, some caution holds — though you tell yourself it's only good manners with a host.

2. “Open the hatch” • → `rg_enslave`

Your hand goes to the latch — and it's not treasure behind it but his swarm, boiling out. Get back!

The Count Is the Weapon `#crown/rg_confront`

The Road to Raggeth • (no QR — in-app “Walk on” beat)

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

“So. The king's little counter, come to my door.” The cauldron seethes, the rot crawling up green and sick. And you understand what the moth meant: the rot is bound to the wood by the wood's own count, and to break it you must name the three true numbers aloud — the benches, the tables, the faces.

First: the resting-benches along the road, counting only from the pond onward.

Choice — “Name the number of resting-benches (from the pond onward).”

1. “Four” • sets: fumbled=true • wrong answer → flare + hint (never advances)

- hint 1: The cauldron flares green and Raggeth laughs. “You didn't count them, did you?” Try again — the resting-benches, from the pond onward only.

- hint 2: Think back along the road — the long incline, the meadow's edge. Five places to sit lay between the pond and this hut.

2. “Five” • → `rg_ward2`

“Five,” you say — and the first true number lands like a hammer-blow. The cauldron cracks; the green boil shudders; Raggeth's sneer falters.

3. “Six” • sets: fumbled=true • wrong answer → flare + hint (never advances)

- hint 1: The cauldron flares green and Raggeth laughs. “You didn't count them, did you?” Try again — the resting-benches, from the pond onward only.

- hint 2: Think back along the road — the long incline, the meadow's edge. Five places to sit lay between the pond and this hut.

4. “Seven” • sets: fumbled=true • wrong answer → flare + hint (never advances)

- hint 1: The cauldron flares green and Raggeth laughs. “You didn't count them, did you?” Try again — the resting-benches, from the pond onward only.

- hint 2: Think back along the road — the long incline, the meadow's edge. Five places to sit lay between the pond and this hut.

The Second Number #crown/rg_ward2

The Road to Raggeth • (no QR — in-app “Walk on” beat)

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

“Lucky,” Raggeth hisses, but the cold has thinned. The second number now: the feast-tables in the bright meadow.

Choice — “Name the number of feast-tables in the meadow.”

1. “Three” • sets: fumbled=true • wrong answer → flare + hint (never advances)

- hint 1: The green flares higher. “Guessing won’t save you.” The feast-tables — picture the bright picnic place.

- hint 2: Four tables stood in the gold light where he tried to make you stay.

2. “Four” • → rg_ward3

“Four,” you say — and the second number lands; the cauldron splits further, and Raggeth’s voice climbs toward a snarl.

3. “Five” • sets: fumbled=true • wrong answer → flare + hint (never advances)

- hint 1: The green flares higher. “Guessing won’t save you.” The feast-tables — picture the bright picnic place.

- hint 2: Four tables stood in the gold light where he tried to make you stay.

4. “Six” • sets: fumbled=true • wrong answer → flare + hint (never advances)

- hint 1: The green flares higher. “Guessing won’t save you.” The feast-tables — picture the bright picnic place.

- hint 2: Four tables stood in the gold light where he tried to make you stay.

The Last Number #crown/rg_ward3

The Road to Raggeth • (no QR — in-app “Walk on” beat)

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

The cauldron is cracked rim to foot now, leaking green; Raggeth is a fury with no warmth left. One number remains — the watching faces at the cut through the fallen tree.

_Variant (has_number):_ The fairy’s word returns to you, clear as her cold spring: seven. You carried it for exactly this moment. Don’t let his snarling knock it loose.

Variant (default): Count them once more in your memory — the faces crowded thick where the great trunk had fallen across the path.

Endings (one is chosen by state):

when: has_number AND NOT fumbled

“Five, and four, and seven,” you say — and the wood’s own count closes around Raggeth like a fist. The cauldron screams and splits from rim to foot; the rot pours out into the starving ground and is gone; and Raggeth — the cold, the thinness, the dry voice — comes apart with his pot, unraveling into nothing with one last astonished sigh. Far off you hear the watching faces, every one, waking and glad. From the wreck you lift the last and truest gold — the heart of the king’s crown, that Raggeth held. You carry it home through a wood already greening behind you, and at the castle you set the three caps and the heart together into the crown, and it is whole — forever whole, this time — and King Bolete rises shining, and the long night ends in dawn. The forest is reborn, and it will not forget the one who saved it.

ENDING: ★ The Crown Reborn · good

- (terminal — “Walk it again”)

when: default

“Five, and four, and seven,” you say at last — and the wood’s own count closes around Raggeth, though you reached it the hard way, by guess and recount, the wood darkening at each wrong word. The cauldron screams and splits; the rot drains into the ground; and Raggeth comes apart with his pot, unraveling into nothing. The wood will live, and the king will rise. But it was clumsy and costly, and you’ll always know there was a cleaner road — that a sharper eye on the long walk would have spared the dark its last gloating. Still: you walked the whole dark way, you did not give in, and you named it true. That is no small thing. From the wreck you lift the heart of the crown; the three caps and the heart make it whole, and the king rises, and dawn comes.

ENDING: ♦ The Pyrrhic Crown · good

- (terminal — “Walk it again”)

Choice — “Name the number of watching faces at the fallen tree.”

1. “Five” · sets: fumbled=true · wrong answer → flare + hint (never advances)

- hint 1: The cold deepens. “You walked right past them.” The watching faces — where the trail cut through the fallen tree.

- hint 2: Seven faces crowded that gap. If the fairy gave you the number, trust her.

2. “Six” · sets: fumbled=true · wrong answer → flare + hint (never advances)

- hint 1: The cold deepens. “You walked right past them.” The watching faces — where the trail cut through the fallen tree.

- hint 2: Seven faces crowded that gap. If the fairy gave you the number, trust her.

3. “Seven”

4. “Eight” · sets: fumbled=true · wrong answer → flare + hint (never advances)

- hint 1: The cold deepens. “You walked right past them.” The watching faces — where the trail cut through the fallen tree.

- hint 2: Seven faces crowded that gap. If the fairy gave you the number, trust her.

5. “Nine” · sets: fumbled=true · wrong answer → flare + hint (never advances)

- hint 1: The cold deepens. “You walked right past them.” The watching faces — where the trail cut through the fallen tree.

- hint 2: Seven faces crowded that gap. If the fairy gave you the number, trust her.

The Bargain #crown/rg_enslave

The Road to Raggeth • (no QR — in-app “Walk on” beat)

Voice: Lord Raggeth (dry as old leaves, patient, terribly kind)

The cold gathered nothing that is Raggeth leans close. “You came,” he purrs. “And you brought it.” You hold out the king’s gold — the two caps, kindness and cleverness, all you gathered on the road — and you name your price: spare me, reward me, give me a place in the wood you’ll rule, let the rot never touch me.

“Of course,” says Raggeth, sweet as honey. “Of course, clever one. Give it here.”

And you set the king’s gold in the dark’s own hand.

The instant you do, you understand. The rot was never going to spare you — the rot makes no bargains; it only makes more rot. It crawls up from the caps, over your hand, up your arm, cold and certain — and Raggeth laughs, not cruelly, almost fondly. “You brought me gold, little one. But you never brought courage — the one thing I could never take from a heart that kept it. And you?” The cold reaches toward your chest. “You gave yours away, back at the graves. Handed it to me yourself. There was never a bargain here. There was only ever this.”

ENDING: 🔴 The Enslavement • bad

- exit: “Accept the dark — THE END”

The cold closes over you, and the last warm thing in you goes out, and you are his — his creature, his new herald, one more cold voice in the wood to call the next traveler off the path. The king dies that night. The forest falls dark. And somewhere on the trail, in a sweet and friendly voice, you find yourself beginning to whisper to someone new: “Why walk so far? Cut across. Come straight to me.”

- exit: “Flee — tear free while an ember’s left”

Something in you — some last coal you hadn’t quite handed over — recoils, and you wrench your arm from the rot and run, the dark searing a mark into you that will never fully fade, out of the hut and down the red markers and away. You don’t stop until the trees thin and a real morning finds you. You’re alive. You’re free. You are not the same, and never will be — you saw exactly what you were willing to become, and how near you came to it. The king is gone, and the wood is rotting, and that is on you, and you’ll carry it. But you ran. That has to be worth something.
